Labour Minister

He said unions need to create platforms that will promote alliances, unity and transformation in the struggle against poverty and inequality.

Nujoma availed himself for consultations on any relevant matter and technical assistance, where needed, but said he will involve himself directly in the arena of collective bargaining except to the extent permitted by law in disputes of national interest.

Nujoma attacked other organisations that are standing up for employees without his Ministry's blessing, saying they are politicking labour issues.

"I observe that a number of politicians are trying to capitalise on the struggles of Namibian workers and to derail their trade unions" Nujoma stated.

He said the self-styled leaders of workers have not tried to organise workers into trade unions, "but prefer to put on colourful costumes and stage media events for their own interests".

According to his ministry, these organisations have never expressed an interest in representing the majority of workers of any employer, in handling their daily grievances or in engaging in collective bargaining.

"What then, is their motive?", Nujoma asked.

According to his Ministry, the politicians and self-styled workers' leaders have seized upon various labour disputes, including lawful strikes, as a means to bring attention to themselves for political reasons.

They are using workers only for the purpose of advancing their political careers and canvassing for future votes.

Nujoma said the status quo calls for the need to strengthen unions, to expand union representation and to utilise or strengthen the procedures afforded by law that protect workers and support their rights.

Unlocking The Wealth Of Africa

to access financial services. Mobile money, for example, has grown in popularity as a means of sending and receiving money, paying bills, and accessing other financial services.

Furthermore, technological advancements have enabled insurance companies to create new products and services that are tailored to the needs of African customers. Some insurers, for example, are now offering micro-insurance products designed to provide low-income individuals and families with affordable coverage. These products are typically sold through mobile phones, making it easier for people to access insurance products and services.

Challenges and Opportunities

While the African financial services sector has grown significantly in recent years, there are still a few challenges that must be addressed to ensure that the sector continues to grow and thrive. One of the major challenges in many African countries is a lack of infrastructure, which makes it difficult for people to access financial services. This is especially true in rural areas, where access to banks and other financial institutions may be limited.

Another issue confronting Africa's financial services sector is a lack of regulation. Many African countries have lax regulatory frameworks, making it difficult for financial institutions to operate effectively and protect their customers' interests. This can lead to problems such as fraud and corruption, which can undermine the credibility of the financial services sector and make it more difficult for customers to trust financial institutions.

Despite these challenges, the African financial services sector has several opportunities. As incomes continue to rise and more people enter the middle class, demand for financial products and services will rise.
